Blue Badge Scheme

Introduction

A Blue Badge may be issued to people with certain disabilities. The Blue Badge is for use in a vehicle that the badge holder is travelling in, either as driver or passenger, and allows you to park in certain restricted areas for a limited period of time. The fact that you currently hold, have previously held, or might previously have been eligible for a Blue Badge does not necessarily mean that you will still be eligible for one. Some local authorities may have parking bays for Blue Badge holders near their homes. However, this depends on local policy and conditions, and the availability of funding. Car park operators, including local authorities, are not required to offer any concession or reduced charges to Blue Badge holders, though some do.

Applications for a Blue Badge should be made directly to your local council or via the www.gov.uk/apply-blue-badge website.

What we can do

If you think that a decision by the Council to refuse a Blue Badge for you, your relative or a person you look after, is flawed, we may be able to help you. We can usually look at your complaint if:

- An application for a Blue Badge has been unreasonably delayed;
- The process of assessment of your application was significantly flawed – for example, it did not follow the legislation or guidance about whether you are eligible or not;

- The Council does not have a review or reassessment procedure for applicants who have been refused a Blue Badge or if it has failed to properly apply its procedure.

What we cannot do

We cannot:

- Question the eligibility criteria set out in the legislation;
- Carry out an assessment of your health care needs and eligibility for a Blue Badge;
- Help you make a request for a Blue Badge (there are other organisations who may do this – see 'further information' below);
- Tell you whether a Blue Badge should have been granted or replace the Council's decision and tell them to give you a Blue Badge;
- Under normal circumstances look at complaints where a statutory right of appeal is available. If a Blue Badge has been refused because of a relevant conviction for past misuse or where the Council requires a Blue Badge to be returned because it believes an applicant to have had it by false representation, there is a right of appeal to the Welsh Government. We are therefore unlikely to be able to look at complaints about these refusals.
